I prefer to turn in top-notch work and always invest a significant amount of pride in every task I take on. But I also understand that it's important to have an open mind and a flexible attitude at work. That's why I'm able to occasionally let my personal standards slide a little when my employer needs me to. So I stay open to change, while at the same time remaining organised and efficient enough to plan out a day or week at a time.

The right job for me will allow me to be analytical and creative. I don't want to be limited by established rules and regulations. My inquisitive nature demands that I some-times question authority. Otherwise, I might not be able to find fresh approaches, or come up with new solutions to a problem. It's not that I act without weighing the pros and cons of a situation, it's more that I'm more willing than others to take justifiable risks if they'll further my career success. I'm smart enough to know when I need help and am confident enough in my abilities to ask for it. I understand that sometimes there are no clear right and wrong answers, and that's just fine with me because I tolerate grey areas better than most. In fact, pondering potential outcomes can sometimes be more interesting than coming up with the definitive solution for me. My right job doesn't have to be about self-expression, but it needs to be a job I can be proud of.

I like being a top priority in my partner's life, but I also respect his independence. Sure, it's important for me to feel valued and appreciated in my relationship, but my expectations for my significant other are realistic and attainable. I definitely know how I want to be treated, but I don't think the only fulfilling relationship is one filled with constant doting.

I am a borderline romantic. Though I am not entirely wooed by splendid shows of love, I can get into a little bit of romance. I tune into my partners' subtle displays of adoration, and my heart soar with appreciation. I always encourage my partner to act romantically by rewarding him when he does try to woo me. When my partner enjoys the magical side of love, I enjoy using my imagination to commit original acts of romance.

I have a quite modern, trendy and permissive attitude to sex, opposed to religious, Victorian, 'old-fashioned' views of what is right and proper in a sexual affair. I'm not really bothered about virginity, I favour pre-material sex, and believe that birth control should be universally available and generally regard sex as a pleasurable activity that is nobody's concern but that of the 'consenting adults' involved. But I have a tendency to take sexual intercourse seriously.
